Instrucciones generales:

Se proveerá a los participantes de todos los folios, debidamente identificados, que necesiten para realizar el examen. Los participantes entregarán todo el papel que se les ha proporcionado al finalizar la prueba. Los ejercicios deberán ser realizados con bolígrafo de color azul o negro. No se recogerán los exámenes elaborados con lápiz, salvo en el caso del ejercicio de Dibujo Técnico. Se permite el uso de calculadora, siempre y cuando no sea programable y no sea la del teléfono móvil o dispositivo electrónico. Para el ejercicio de la materia «Dibujo Técnico» se podrán utilizar los siguientes elementos de dibujo: lápiz o portaminas, goma, sacapuntas, regla graduada o escalímetro, escuadra, cartabón, transportador de ángulos y compás. Para la realización del resto de los diferentes ejercicios no se precisa de ningún material específico y, por lo tanto, no se permitirá la utilización de materiales ajenos a los permitidos para las pruebas ni el uso del teléfono móvil ni de cualquier otro dispositivo electrónico. El incumplimiento de esa condición supondrá la expulsión y anulación de la prueba.

1. READING COMPREHENSION.

According to some parents, if you play computer games, you will become violent. Other parents say, “If you spend hours in front of the computer monitor, you won’t succeed at school.” They think that computer games can turn clever, hard-working students into lazy, unfriendly people. But some scientists think these parents are wrong and there are many good things about the virtual world on your computer screen.

To begin with, computer games can improve reading and writing skills. If you want to play a game well, you will read its instructions carefully. Many games also require people to read short texts about the characters and plot, and some even require people to write paragraphs. Playing games also teaches people to pay attention. Students with ADHD (Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder) can’t sit quietly in class for a long time. However, they often play computer games for hours. Most computer games are interactive. To win the game, you must click on the mouse or press a key on the keyboard at the correct time. This helps children with ADHD learn to pay attention.

Games players also learn to follow the movement of many objects at the same time, a useful skill in real-life sports and in driving, too. Action games teach people to make decisions quickly. In fact, action game players are 25% faster at making decisions than other people. A study of Runescape, one of the most popular virtual worlds for 11-18-year-old British children, showed that virtual reality games help children develop their personality. Shy children can create confident avatars and weak children can become strong leaders in virtual reality. Now, some schools and universities around the world are using virtual reality to help their students in different ways.
